At first, the absence of something made them feel uneasy. "I remember after Christmas one year, my mom pulled out the Christmas decorations and they were gone," said Lori Coleman, who grew up in the Northridge section of Los Angeles. "We didn't have a TV so we spent New Year's Eve with a guitar." But sometime in the late 1950s, the sight of empty television sets in many children's rooms took on a more menacing tone. The Castro Leisure Company, a startup that sold TV sets in the 1950s, experienced a rapid fall in demand after advertising was cut in half in 1958, according to a Time magazine article from that year. The company had many similarities to Netflix and other streaming services that today cater to a vast, worldwide audience with little to no traditional advertising. "How do you know what movies to market? How do you know what books to market?" Leonard Bruce, president of Castro Leisure, asked in the article. "You look at the people that are buying, and you buy for them." In this decade-old photo, a vendor displays a television set during the January 1952 West Coast Consumer Electronics Show in Burbank, Calif. (Los Angeles Times) Eventually, Castro Leisure packed up its TVs and left Burbank. The products no longer appeared in department stores, according to the article. "You know, we're not in that business anymore," a saleswoman told a Times reporter. What followed, according to the article, was a far more competitive market. By 1962, a Times reporter noted a "gloriously competitive" Las Vegas showroom, selling "heavy, plush, draping living room sets." Then, televisions were expensive. At the time of the article, " 1cb139a0ed
